Rulleff and the Scholarship.

It would seem that Rulloff, the convicted murderer and thiet, is fully endowed with the pride of inteller and believes very much in the value of his own work as a scholar, lie says, in a communication to the Binghampton Leader, dated the 15th inst. "Strange as it may seem, no man this day on God's earth has lived with a igher object than myself, and few have accomplished a more desirable result. Though laboring under every disadvantage, I have steadily persist ed; and even now a law words may be said by way of insuring success to the work upon which my health, my strength, and all the best energies of my life have been expended; that is, my work upon Method in the Formation of Language." That work may now have to be published without being completed. It contains in the form of a regular treatise most of the leading principles connected with the formation of methodical language. There is no reason to doubt that this statement is honestly made, and that the iden really prides himself, and has some resson to do so, on his work for the mivaneswhich he gives some specimens in the Leader. His theory is in some re-spects absurd, but his illustrations of t show sound scholarship, patient invertigation and a wide range of reading. He must not be set down as a superficial scholar or thinker, though de conclusions are often far astray, In respect to his remarkable powers of memory and analysis, Professor Seelye, of Amhurst College (who was a student of theology at Auburn when Rulloff was serving his term in the State prison there, and thus become acquainted with him), gives a signal instance. Professor Scalye had with aim on one of his visits to the prison, where he taught a Sunday school class, a copy of Taylor Lewis' nock "Plate Centra Athess," containing Plato's faurous argument for the being of a God, translated into Eng-lish. Rulloff desired to borrow the book, and did so; on returning it, he had written on loose leaves, here and there, exities in on the translation and on the argument of the original, in which he had cited, from memory, as I believed, many pages in Greek from Horodotus, Thucydides, Amereca Homer and other authors, usually with great correctness and pertinence The whole was done by him in his cell, yet it was a piece of scholarty work, such as few professors could excel, writing amid the resources of their well equipped libraries. In point of penmanship, it was exquisite, and like a finished engraving. In course of their acqualctance, now many years ago, Halloff gave Professor Seeiye a statement of his religious belief, which was a curious mixture of Greek panthelsm and modern materialism. He did not then, any more than be does now, appear to have any moral misgivings as to his course of life, but regarded himinjured by society.
